

The Docklands quarter took a dip but the bounce-back has begun. Its size and population will double in a decade, says David Spittles

A new Canary Wharf designed for families

CANARY WHARF, LONDON'S financial district, is a booming area with a reputation for being a desirable place to live. The Docklands quarter, which is home to the Canary Wharf skyscraper, is set to become a residential hub. The area is being redeveloped to include a mix of housing, from affordable to luxury. The new development is designed to be family-friendly, with schools, parks, and community facilities. The Docklands quarter is a key part of London's regeneration strategy, and the new development is a testament to the area's potential.

IT WILL BE A MIXED USE DEVELOPMENT with a mix of housing, from affordable to luxury. The new development is designed to be family-friendly, with schools, parks, and community facilities. The Docklands quarter is a key part of London's regeneration strategy, and the new development is a testament to the area's potential.

THE NEW DEVELOPMENT is designed to be family-friendly, with schools, parks, and community facilities. The Docklands quarter is a key part of London's regeneration strategy, and the new development is a testament to the area's potential.

STORIES WITH A TWIST The new development is designed to be family-friendly, with schools, parks, and community facilities. The Docklands quarter is a key part of London's regeneration strategy, and the new development is a testament to the area's potential.

THE NEW DEVELOPMENT is designed to be family-friendly, with schools, parks, and community facilities. The Docklands quarter is a key part of London's regeneration strategy, and the new development is a testament to the area's potential.